The skin is often the first site of metastatic disease. This is due to its accessibility, the presence of many blood and lymph vessels, and the continuous turnover of epidermal cells and keratinocytes. We describe a 47-year-old patient who presented with skin metastases as the first symptom of a carcinoma of the prostate. After histological examination of a nodule in the subcutis, the patient was treated for this tumor. Histopathological examination of a skin biopsy revealed a well-differentiated squamous cell carcinoma. Subsequent studies showed that this patient had a large cell carcinoma of the prostate and disseminated progression of the disease. Thereafter, the patient died of prostate cancer.

When I finished my elevator software, the more I thought about it the more I wanted to learn. I ended up pursuing an IRF certificate and progressing to a second in the same semester. I know a lot has changed since then but I’ve kept my independent project as a way to stay motivated and keep my programming skills sharp. Even if I
